

PhD Graduate Assistantship Available with Focus on Cultivation and Analysis of Neutraceutical Plants

WSU scientists have achieved international recognition for fundamental and cross-disciplinary research on plant and soil processes with applications to agriculture and environmental management. Recent support for this research has come from Washington's Life Science Discovery Fund. The multidisciplinary project will address cultivation effects on artemisinin profiles in Artemisia annua with the ultimate goal of developing the species into a crop for Washington.

Assistantship Details:

The Department of Crop and Soil Sciences, Washington State University, offers graduate research assistantships to qualified graduate students from recognized colleges and universities. Research assistants conduct experiments under the direction of their advisor. Graduate student appointments are half-time and students on formal appointment receive stipends on an annual basis. Students are expected to work part-time on research during the academic year and full-time during the summer. Appointments are continued for a minimum of two years for M.S. students and three years for Ph.D. students, dependant upon satisfactory performance and the maintenance of a 3.0 GPA on a 4.0 scale.

Salary Range: $17,154.00 M.S. ($1429.50/mo); $18,204.00 Ph.D ($1517/mo). The assistantship appointment also includes tuition waivers per our policy outlined at <http://gradsch.wsu.edu>. Resident tuition waivers have an estimated value of $3,731 per semester; non-resident waivers have an estimated value of $6,094 per semester. All students on an assistantship are required to pay a residual fee each semester of approximately $1,000.00. The residual fee pays for Health and Wellness Services, Pullman Transit, the Student Recreation Center, and a small portion of tuition not covered by the assistantship. Also included is a comprehensive health (medical/dental) insurance program with the annual premium paid by the department estimated at $1,500.
